SIX-GUN HEROES

THE END

THE UNTAMED

BLACKIE NORTON studied the distant hills with his field glasses. Lines furrowed across his bronzed forehead, and his lips twisted, as he found what he was looking for—a herd of slow-moving wild horses. Fifteen or twenty mares, several colts and yearlings—and the boss of the outfit, a tall, graceful strawberry roan stallion.

"C'mere, Cliff. Blackie muttered. "Take a look at that herd . . . an' at that stallion!"

Cliff Bales took the binoculars from his boss' hand.

Slowly, he focussed them on the distant hill . . . and then he too grunted. He put the glasses down and turned toward Blackie Norton.

"Fine," he said. "It's a good herd. It'd be worth plenty if you could round it up. But you ain't goin' to. Did you see that big stallion at the head of it?"

"The roan?"

"Yeh," nodded Cliff Bales. "They call him Red Roan. He's the fastest stallion—an' the smartest hoss ever seen in these parts. Folks have been tryin' to round up his herd for years—without even gettin' a sniff of 'em. So you might as well give up right now, Blackie, an' not waste your time. Red Roan won't be caught!"

"Oh, no?"

Angrily, Blackie Norton jammed the glasses into their case and kneed his horse forward into a canter.

"We're roundin' up that herd, Cliff. I'm sellin' the mares for rodeo an' ranch work—an' I'm agonna keep th' big red hoss for myself. Hear me? We're roundin' 'em up—startin' now!"

When Blackie Norton said a thing, he meant it. A seasoned veteran of the ranch country, and of the Colorado hills, he had done just about everything a drifting cow waddy could do. He had been a cook, straw boss and horse wrangler. Right now, he and Cliff Bales were working at rounding up wild horses and unbranded strays, selling them to the highest bidder. It was open and above-board, according to the law, but many ranch and cattlemen disliked men like Blackie, because of their tactics and cruelty.

Now, as he quirked his big bay horse into a ground-covering canter, Blackie went over the ways he and Cliff might round up Red Roan's herd.

"We might be able to trap the whole shebang of 'em in a dead-end arroyo. But I doubt that, if th' roan's as smart as you say he is, Cliff. Or, we might work in relays to tire 'em out. But that would take more men an' hosses than we've got. If I get close enough for a good shot, I might be able to crease his forehead, an' get him that way. Or . . ."

"Or?"

Blackie hesitated. "I just wonder, Cliff. It's against the law, but it might just work. Did you ever hear of usin' barbed wire to catch a herd?"

"Barbed wire? How does that work, Blackie?"

Swiftly, the horse dealer explained his plan. Red Roan would probably be too smart to lead his herd up a blind alley—one that he knew to have no escape. But if they could find an arroyo or small valley with a couple of narrow entrances, and bottle up one of them with barbed wire . . . they might be able to trick the herd into entering it. And when that was done . . .

"Why, we'll have 'em dead to rights," Blackie Norton exclaimed. "We'll just rope 'em one at a time—an' brand 'em, rope 'em together an' take 'em down to market. Except for Red Roan. I'm a-keepin' him for myself!"

"Not bad," nodded Cliff Bales. "Have you got barbed wire?"

"Right down in our supply wagon! Let's get it an' go to work!"

THAT WAS THE WAY IT started. At first Red Roan was not worried when the two riders began to trail his herd. He was used to the two-footed creatures who thought they could trap his mares and colts. Always, through his cunning and stamina, and his knowledge of the hills, he had brought the herd through safely. Never had the riders come close to trapping the herd.

But these two men were persistent! Day and night, one of them was always trailing the herd. One slept and the other continued the relentless pursuit. The herd was unable to stop and graze or drink, for more than short periods of time. The chase was telling on the herd's condition.

(Please turn to next page)

Then, one day, Blackie Norton sprang the trap.

Cliff had been trailing the herd through the night, until they were nervous and fidgety. Then, as they trotted across the plain, Blackie suddenly galloped out of hiding, firing his revolver in the air. Instantly alert, Red Roan wheeled about, whinnying shrilly.

"There they go," Cliff shouted. "It's workin'!"

It was true! Red Roan, not knowing that the night before Blackie had strung a fence of barbed wire across the other entrance, was leading the herd into a narrow arroyo.

"We've got 'em," Blackie grinned triumphantly. "There's not a way in the world for them to get out!" He waved at Cliff. "Hey, Bales. Stay here in this entrance. They won't dare to come near you. I'm goin' in, to see if I can get a rope on the big one!"

Kneeing his mount forward cautiously, Blackie Norton saw the wild horse herd nervously milling around at the other end of the arroyo. One or two of the young colts had brushed against the barbed wire, and had been painfully pricked. Now the entire herd was staying clear of the fence.

Blackie slowly shook his lariat loose, and fashioned a loop. Swinging it in an easy curve, he approached Red Roan.

Ears pricked, the big strawberry stallion cantered away gracefully. But Blackie was in no hurry.

Round and around the walls of the tiny arroyo, Red Roan trotted, head tossing high and beautiful mane waving. His eyes and sensitive nostrils explored every possible opening—but he soon came to realize the truth.

The herd was bottled in! There were only two entrances to the canyon. The rider blocked one, barbed wire the other.

Then Red Roan made up his mind!

Neighing loudly and clearly, he wheeled and galloped toward the barbed wire-blocked entrance at top speed. Immediately, the other horses of the herd fell in behind him. Blackie Norton watched, without worrying. "What do you think you're goin' to do, Red Roan? Fly over that fence?"

Dramatically, the answer came as the great red stallion flung himself straight at the fence. His weight bore against it, forcing it down. He fell forward, and the strands of barbed wire bit cruelly into his silky side, tearing and ripping great bloody gashes. But he had shown the way. One section of the fence was down. There was a gap for the other horses to gallop through. And they took full advantage of it, thundering through the narrow entrance to the freedom that lay past it!

"Well, I'll be—" snarled Blackie Norton! "The mule-headed cayuse!"

Angrily, he spurred his bay into a gallop. His lasso swung out in a wide loop over his head. All of the herd had gone through, but Red Roan was just starting to clamber up from the fence he had held down so painfully. There was a chance...

The horse dealer's lariat flashed out. It whipped through the air and settled cleanly over Red Roan's arched neck.

"That does it!" half-shouted Blackie Norton. "I'd give up the whole herd any time, just to get a horse like that!"

Grinning, he pulled the rope taut. Red Roan was standing now, trembling, the rope around his neck, his sides bleeding in a dozen spots from the cruel barbs. His great luminous eyes were fixed on Norton, as the man approached him.

"Steady," husked Blackie. He would the rope tight around the base of a nearby pine, and picked up a thick branch that lay at the root of the tree. Slowly he walked toward Red Roan.

Angrily, the horse reared upright, his hooves lashing out at Blackie.

"Why, you red devil," snarled the man. With the branch, he clubbed swiftly at the stallion's head. Frantically, with all his strength, Red Roan pulled away. And, as he did so, the lariat, which had been hastily coiled about the pine, began to unwind. It flicked around the tree like a snake. Red Roan was pulling it loose.

"He'll get away," gasped Norton.

Leaping forward, he clutched the loose rope. But now Red Roan was plunging for the gap in the barbed wire where the fence was pressed down. As Blackie grabbed the rope, he was pulled along, irresistibly, to the barbed wire fence. There he was caught. He fell forward, as the stallion had done, and once again the barbs of the fence slashed painfully.

CRYING out, the dealer released the rope, trapped by the wire that he himself had put up. And now Red Roan, loose once again, galloped toward the open prairie... rejoicing in the freedom he had won, for himself and his herd.
